PORT'S CORNER.

Written for the Spirit of the Age. Think not I have a happy heart. BY M. N. SNYDER. Think not I have a happy heart In memeats when I seem so gay,

The smile I wear must soon depart, Life has no charms to lure its stay. Though melanenoiy is concessed, And though I revel with the throng, The mask I wear can scarcely shield My besems pange, so deep and strong.

The scentless tlower, whose leaves are dead, May seem a fragrance to exhale, While sweet perfumes around are shed And wafted to it on the gale. And so the drooping heart may feel, When touched by passing pleasure's wing, A sense of gladness o'er it steal Of momentary lingaring.

The meteor whose flashing beams Dispel the darkness from on high, But for a moment fitful gleams, Then lights no more the midnight sky. And so upon the gloomy heart May brilliant seemes their lustre throw, And then a transient smile may start, And then the sullen brow may glow.

Although I may, at times, assume A lively air -- a gay disgnise-Though from my clouded brow the gloom Is chread by light of brilliant eyes, Think not I have a happy heart In moments when I seem so gay, The smile I wear must soon depart,

Written for the Spirit of the Age. The Wine Cup. BY JUANNIE. Know ye not the serpent lurketh, In the wine cup's sparkling depths? West ye not its deadly renom,

Life has no charms to lure its stay.

Heed ye how the hateful poison, Sours the brain and taunts the soul? Head ye how dark Lethe's waters, O'er domestic joy it rolls?

As ye quaff with careless lips?

Heed ye not the wait of anguish, From ten thousand bleeding hearts? Writhing 'seath the desolation. Wroughs by rum's infernal darte?

Hear ye not the muttered mosning Of the grave's disturbed rest, Broken to usher in a sleeper. Elain by poison quaffed for pleasure,

From the rosy feaming bowl, Sealing death to nerve and vital, And damnation to the soul. Know ye that the vilest spirits, That perdition's borders line,

Passed from out the portals, gleaming With the rad, enticing wine? Will ye quaff it? Will ye longer, Toy above the dread abyse?

Will ye not from out your households, The alluring sup dismiss ? Simsbury, Ct. 1856. Written for the Spirit of the Age.

The Dawn and Decline. BY T. D. HILL. A streamlet from the mountain gurgling,

Over each shining peoble rushing, From rock to rock incessant leaping, Or slowly e'er some level creeping, In wintry days is warm and pure, Until wishin the point that's freezing Its warmth by slow degrees decreasing, The crusty surface o'er it stealing, The crystal stream below concealing, The chilly tide becomes obscure.

"Tie thus while early childhood's dawning, Bearing the light of life's clear morning, In simple toys and plays delighting With comrades few, but fond, uniting-The heart as pure as summer day , But trouble, care and love combining-The heavy heart begins replaing Till frozen each congenial feeling, And e'er the soul remorse is stealing-When former hopes are fled away.
